As India's largest film industry, Bollywood has long been the center of all things cinematic. The movie industry started out in Bombay, India in the 1920s and took off shortly after. In the 1930s, sound was added to Indian cinema and the next decade would see some of the greatest Bollywood films. In 1947, India gained its independence from Britain and Bombay became Mumbai, but the film industry remained strong. In fact, it may have been stronger than ever at this point because of a new demand for Indian movies in other countries like America and Russia. The Indian government established the National Film Development Corporation (NFDC) in 1973 and this organization has been instrumental in preserving and promoting Bollywood movies. They've also worked to establish film festivals and theaters dedicated to Indian cinema all over the world. The NFDC's goal is to make sure that Bollywood films are as widely available as possible. Thanks to this organization, it's easy for those who live without access to great Bollywood movies to discover them. In Indian cinema, song and dance have been around since the very first film was produced back in 1913. In those early days, India had no sound recording equipment so Indian films had song-and-dance sequences that helped viewers understand what was happening on screen without sound or subtitles. Song-and-dance sequences are still used in Indian films today, but the focus of Bollywood films isn't always on song and dance. When that's the case, videos or soundtracks are available for sale. You can also find full length Hindi movies dubbed in English on this website in case you're interested! Bollywood has thousands of musicians in its cast, crew, and orchestra. The film industry includes all kinds of singers, composers, directors, choreographers, make up artists, choreographers, script writers and technicians. This large group of people work together to make Bollywood films come to life.
